Not illustrated. 1901 Excerpt: ...caught a large pig, which was killed, and which they ate this day, Sunday Saturday. They caught another small one, which was killed. They saw a very large and broad temple, wherein were painted many figures of devils with horns like those of goats; it had a large, wide porch, with a breastwork of boards, which seemed to be a counter. In it they found many cocoanuts and other things, which the natives apparently had offered to the Devil. It contained many secret places and apartments. In front of it was a rostrum or pulpit, which seemed to be boarded; it was large and very high, with steps to mount up to it.1 After they had gone all over it, and looked at it well, without the natives hindering them, or anyone appearing, they returned to the brigantine, having got water from a small river which was there. It was determined to prepare for dinner, and they dined between the banks of this river. And while the negroes were washing clothes and preparing dinner, some time having passed since all this happened, the Indians came back to rally themselves, and 1 These temples were oka, canoe-houses, or public halls, and the paintings and carvings of sea-ghosts, which are very remarkable in this district, might easily be mistaken for devils with horns. Though offerings are made to the spirits represented by the carvings, the figures are not idols, nor are the buildings temples in the English sense of the word. The pulpits, called bea, are very characteristic of S. Christoval and the islands in its neighbourhood. the sentinels whom our people had posted saw them coming with great fury to attack them; and our people prepared to receive them, and had they not done so, the Indians might have done them damage whilst embarking, because they came on with great determination.
